

Q. My ex who is registered with the Family Responsibility Office (Government Collection Agency for child support) (FRO) owes me a few thousand (almost 10) dollars in child support. Due to the fact that he is a contractor with no real employment contract I have been unable to collect funds. He helps out with support when my daughter visits him but as far as myself receiving funds, $0.

What can I do? I have contacted and written to the Family Responsibility Office (FRO) (Government Collection Agency) numerous times. They have tried to enforce the Court's Order re: assets, but he has none. They have tried to revoke his Driver's license but he lost that anyway. I thank you.

A. Answer: Ask the FRO if they have had his income tax refund or any other government monies owing to him seized. Also ask them if they have seized his passport. They can do that. Most importantly, ask them why they haven't bothered to commence "committal proceedings" meaning Court action that could lead to him being thrown into jail for several weeks at a time, until he finally pays. If the FRO continues to stall or gives excuses, call your local Provincial MPP and complain that the FRO legislation doesn't let you sue without the FRO (unless your ex consents –fat chance eh?) and the FRO is not moving fast enough. Then keep bugging your MPP to have the FRO press the Courts to escort him in jail.

However, even if they threaten Court action the FRO often then simply accepts whatever your ex will claim his income to be (some absurdly low figure.) The FRO will then settle with your ex on some small monthly payment to extinguish the arrears) so long as he maintains the ongoing support payments in the future at the correct amount. Nonetheless, you should press the FRO to have him thrown in jail anyway -- this and the passport route are your best way to go. If jail ever becomes a serious threat its amazing how quickly these arrears get paid.

You can also go back to Court and ask for an increase in child support. When he tries to defend he will be unable to do so because of his arrears of support. In addition, it gives you the opportunity to investigate his sources of his revenue in the course of these proceedings. Your lawyer then has the right to review all of his revenue sources going back three years. Forensic accountants and detective services can also uncover undisclosed sources of revenue.
